

Project Update: January 2019

As a part of my project, I was intending to participate in scientific talks to share the achievements of the research with local people in order to promote conservation awareness within the community of Caravelas city, where the Arolhos Park is located.

In this context, I have been involved with the Arolhos Marine National Park staff in a course for local guides within the national park. This course was carried out between 10th and 12th December 2018. During this course, we had the opportunity to gather together local fishermen, tourist guides, managers and scientists. It was an excellent opportunity to discuss aspects of use and conservation of marine environments of the Arolhos National Park with all the involved parties.

Results presentation for the local community in the Arolhos Marine National Park

Audience of the formation course for tourist guides in the Arolhos Marine National Park