

Project Update: April 2012

I wish to share a link in which we are interviewed by wildlife photographer and crocodile attack specialist, Brandon Sideleau, along with Adam Britton, one of the top crocodile experts in the world today.

Of course, the support of the Edmonton Reptile and Amphibian Society, The Global Federation of Animal Sanctuaries, and The Rufford Small Grants Foundation are all mentioned in the podcast: <http://crocodilian.blogspot.com/2012/02/croclog-podcast-episode-9.html> Our interview starts around minute 42 and lasts at least 30 minutes.

Additionally, if you have not seen our latest rescues, be sure to check out the amazing story of the recovery and re-release of a shot crocodile, and one of the two crocodiles we rescued from a sewage pit and now have in captivity for rehabilitation. We will be rescuing the second crocodile from this same pit today. <http://www.americancrocodilesanctuary.org/apps/videos/> and <http://www.americancrocodilesanctuary.org/apps/photos/>

Busy with rescues and nesting season, I will be completing my application for the next Rufford Small Grant this week to continue our research and to have collected crocodile scute samples exported to the USA for toxicity testing.

My final publishable article will follow shortly thereafter. Collecting data, rescuing crocodiles, and filming, including Discovery Channel World's "Wildlife SOS," has us busier than ever. I have been asked by The World Wildlife Foundation Poland to appear on their newest series, "Women at the End of the World," filming to start this last summer. I aim to make all of you proud.
